Excerpt: .It e er must come, with joy or sorrow rife, -And, in a park fann d by the cooling breeze, A mansion stands, part hid by noble trees; There, neath a porch of Doric structure rare, An aged man, with face o ercast with care, (That long has past, ) now sits him down at ease, With all the comforts that the heart can please On every side; and with his loving wife, In peace glides by the evening of his life. He sees the deer in many a leafy glade Gazing around, or browsing in the shade Of some tall tree, or, with a sudden start, Swift as the wind, far o er the greensward dart. Towards yon vale, by chance he casts his eyes, For there in peace a humble cottage lies, Built in the lane that bounds his vast estate, Thither he looks, the distance is not great- Twas in that hovel with its single room Dwelt those who now are sleeping in the tomb---He thinks how he, when he was young and poor, In childish sport had played before the door--Or watch d to see his father homeward come-And now, a mansion is his princely home! The rooks at length have hasten d to their rest, The orb of day has sunk beneath the west; He sheds a tear, he upward casts his eyes, He breathes a prayer to One beyond the skies, Reviews his life, thinks of his early...
