The servants were just coming out from prayers as he opened the hall door, so he hung up his cap, and went into the dining-room at once. It was a long, low room, luxuriously furnished, and the walls covered with handsome pictures; a great fire was burning, and at the table, making breakfast, stood a tall, slim girl of nineteen. In the window an old lady was uncovering a whole row of bird-cages, and supplying them with sugar, arid at the table was seated the master of the house, an elderly man, very grave and care-worn; dark, deep-set eyes under a massive forehead, and a thin sensitive mouth, the lips firmly compressed. A pile of letters lay before him, and he held a paper in his hand. The girl looked...
